This study examined the construct validity of the Emotionality, Activity, Sociability, and Playfulness (EASP) scales of the Affective-Communication Scales, a self-report measure of "affective reactions" during psychoanalytic treatment. The EASP scales were administered to 48 patients (n = 30 female, n = 18 male) treated at the Institute of Psychoanalysis in Boston. Data were collected from pre-treatment and post-treatment periods. The purpose of this study was to determine if the EASP scales were measuring construct (i.e., similar) affective reactions that are associated with psychoanalytic treatment outcome. The psychoanalytic literature supports the hypothesis that affective reactions during treatment are associated with better outcome. An investigation of the construct validity of the EASP scales was conducted with correlations between the EASP scales and the scales of the Psychodynamic Diagnostic Interview (PDI) and the Self-Compassion Scale. Good to excellent correlations were found between the EASP scales and the PDI and SCS scales. The results suggest that the EASP scales measure a construct similar to the construct measured by the PDI and SCS.Один вариант назва

Mar 11, 2020 The "Rijal al-Kashshī", Arabic for "The Men of the Kashmiri Tradition", is a collection of Arabic Sufi spiritual books compiled from manuscripts dating back to the 12th century AD. This rich volume of Sufi thought consists of the books written by a number of authors who are considered to be the "founding fathers" of the Kashmiri tradition.
