The best resolution to save in the file is the highest possible and is represented as 300 ppi. For example, if you're using a 24-inch flatbed scanner, the resolution of the image is 600 ppi. - The resolution of an image is the physical measurements of its components. Vertebral artery dissections (VADs) are usually secondary to trauma, connective tissue abnormalities, inflammation, and congenital abnormalities. Histopathologic examination reveals arteriosclerotic changes in the wall of the artery, with inflammatory cells and fibroblastic proliferation extending into the vessel. In blunt trauma, an axial-force impaction causes an acute disruption of the wall of the artery with intimal and adventitial tears or sloughing. The diagnosis usually requires lumbar spine computed tomography or magnetic resonance imaging. The treatment is conservative if there are no neurologic deficits. If there is spinal canal compromise, the indications for surgical intervention are acute and chronic instability with loss of conservative management. Cervical artery dissection, either anterolateral or posterolateral, is also called Dissecting Aortic Aneurysm (DAA). When dissection occurs in the ipsilateral subclavian artery, it is called Superior Inferior Vertebral Artery (SIVA) dissection. The treatment for dissection, whether cervical or vertebral, is based on the early detection and follow-up. The diagnosis is difficult, and the history of trauma is not always clear.
