In Sensorium, you control a glowing head called "The Observer," and your goal is to explore a strange, dangerous world, and find your way home, all with the help of your senses. Using a combination of sight, touch, taste, smell, and hearing, you navigate through rooms, solve puzzles, and hunt for clues. You can hear sounds, see a strange world through a set of glass windows, touch things and interact with them, and even smell the world around you. Scanning a room will provide you with additional information, or clues, about what to do next. The Observer can only explore in a limited area of a room, so you may have to spend a while or even multiple visits to find everything you need. The Observer will change state for certain things depending on the environment and your current circumstances. For example, touching a red crystal will change you to a hostile state called The Uncomprehending Observer, and a non-living wall will not register as present. There is a condition called The Riddle. If the Observers are unwell and you have a riddle, you may try to ask a question and see if you can figure out what the answer is. Each room has a button that will bring up a list of questions on the screen. You can choose your own words, and use buttons at the bottom of the screen to do the sums as you see fit. You can also use a slider, which will use a random word. There is no right or wrong answer, but the easier the question is to answer, the more points you get. You may also pick up glowing keys that have 4 states. They will unlock doors, but each key has an expiration date (all doors/keys are non-functioning for the first 3 days). Unlocked doors cannot be opened by the Observer without a key. Every hour, a door unlocks automatically, so if you leave the room for a few hours, you may want to make sure all the doors are locked again. Maps: Just like in the Myst games, you can view a map during gameplay. The map will change depending on the environment. For example, a room that is locked will have an icon that indicates that the room is locked. That means it is impossible to get into the room without a key. You can also view your progress on a "journal" screen. You can see the room that you are in, and the rooms you have visited, along with the time and completion

What's new:

Tiny Thief is an Epcot attraction which opened to the public on April 16, 2016, to coincide with the park's 50th birthday. The attraction, which is based on the Qix characters, can be found in the Land Pavilion. It is the first animatronic attraction at Epcot and the first to be based on an existing video game franchise. History Just after Epcot's opening in 1982, Disney's Imagineers considered including in the park a restaurant and activity based on Tiny Tim, a character from A Christmas Carol by Charles Dickens. Artist John Hench designed drawings for an animatronic Tiny Tim character to be included in the restaurant but the project failed. On November 15, 1996, Disney Legend Diz Clark announced during a dinner honoring Mickey Mouse that Disney would be integrating a feature film from the video game development industry into Epcot, a step the company had not taken since the opening of Kid's Terminal in 1982. In April 2001, the first meeting of the project management team took place, with Scott Trowbridge named project manager. At the time of the announcement the project wasn't yet a game-based attraction, but just a "high concept" to inspire and help guide the park designers as they built the attraction. After Hench's drawings were adopted, many effects and animation elements from the original design made it into the final attraction. Most of the engineering test models and rides were destroyed during the 2004 New York City blackout. The attraction was announced on August 23, 2006, with plans including a Toy Story-inspired structure featuring numerous attractions and scenes based on the Toy Story films. The attraction, at a cost of $50 to $60 million, was to be fully operational for the start of Epcot's 50th anniversary on April 16, 2016. A model of the attraction was on display in the 2011 D23 EXPO at the Walt Disney World Resort. The first prototype for the attraction was built on a stage in Epcot. A second prototype of the attraction was built in Burton, Michigan, the game developer for the attraction's attraction. The final attraction was built in the United States by the British company Vekoma and it took over one year to complete. The company used CGI for the attraction's opening scenes, which eventually became obsolete in favor of the attraction's attraction. The attraction was officially announced on December 18, 2007, and was announced to open in early 2009. On February 18, 2008, Disney announced
