In known pressurized containers of this type the carbon dioxide is fed to the container for a time sufficient to saturate the beverage and to allow the carbon dioxide to reach the bottom of the container for storage, which container is separable from the container feed mechanism to which it is attached in such a way that once the gas is contained in the container it cannot escape. The feeding mechanism usually comprises a suitable source of high pressure gas and a gas inlet and outlet to the container. Because of its high pressure, however, this gas has a tendency to leak through the seal between the container and the feeding mechanism. To prevent this leakage and the escape of carbon dioxide when the container is removed from the feeding mechanism, the containers are of some size and are generally provided with some form of seal retaining mechanism. Another problem associated with known pressurized containers for beverages is that they are susceptible to damage or distortion during transportation, and particular care must be taken in handling them with care during filling and transport. It is an object of the present invention to provide an improved pressurized container.
