There are also programs that can take a phone's front camera, and then stream it to the smartphone. This makes sense, because it means that both devices don't need to involve video drivers. The problem is that this implementation usually requires the phone to manually activate the feature, so the problem space isn't as broad as our list above. Also, the resolution of the images doesn't seem to be any higher than a regular webcam, but not many apps support the necessary settings. The only way to connect to your PC over the internet is to use a type of virtual webcam device. An easy way to set up and control this would be to use a USB webcam, and then have this USB webcam wrapped up in a virtual interface that allows the computer to see it as though it were a physical webcam. Do you want to convert an iPhone or iPad into a genuine webcam for free? Ever since Apple launched the iPad, it's been a popular device for taking pictures and starting video calls, but the device does not support a webcam. Obviously, you cannot use it as a stand-alone video-conferencing device. This is a problem that Apple must fix to enable new uses for the iPad. However, there is a workaround that lets you use your iPad as a webcam-like device, and it's for free. Here's how to do it. IP Webcam Pro is a stand-alone app for the Android platform that lets you use your smartphone or tablet as a webcam. It supports H.264 video and can work on Wi-Fi as well as over 3G. The app lets you enable the connection between your phone and the camera in two ways: either using your cell phone's USB port or using Bluetooth. Since it is a stand-alone app, you must get IP Webcam Pro for Android before you can use it as a webcam.
