in the 1970s, the civil war between the sri lankan military and the liberation tigers of tamil eelam (ltte) resulted in a declaration of a state of emergency, three years of martial law, and heavy restrictions on civil rights. the fighting between the military and tamil separatists was particularly intense in the final years of the conflict, with heavy fighting in the north in the summer of 1983. by the end of the war, the army had conquered all but a small area in the north-east. the war ended in may 2009, when the ltte surrendered unconditionally after suffering a rout in the battle of mullaitivu. in the end, the civil war claimed the lives of an estimated 100,000 people. the end of the war was not without controversy, as the un human rights council found that the sri lankan military violated human rights during the conflict. the first round of violence occurred in early 1983. in may, 1983, a bomb exploded in an apartment belonging to a family that supported the tamil tigers. the apartment housed senior politicians as well as nearly 100 children. more than 100 died in the blast, as well as a number of bystanders who had gathered to try and assist the children in the building. the government characterized the attack as a suicide bombing, which was immediately followed by the assassination of another senior tamil politician on 21 may. violence continued to escalate, and the sri lankan government responded with excessive force. according to a human rights watch report, sri lankan security forces killed more than 7,000 civilians, including more than 1,000 children, during the course of the insurrection. while several politicians and activists were assassinated, the tigers also targeted civilians. thousands of civilians, including many members of the minority tamils and muslims, were killed during the civil war. human rights watch noted that the government did not have to account for the deaths of civilians on its own side.
