Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method of moving data from a source location to a destination location in a windowing system having a plurality of physical destinations, and a system for implementing the method. 2. Description of the Prior Art Methods of transporting data to multiple destinations, and more particularly, methods of transporting data in a windowing system, have been known for some time. One such method is known as one-copy transport in which a single copy of the data is copied for each destination. In a typical one-copy transport system, the source is typically a file server which delivers the data to a plurality of clients. In one-copy transport, each destination is able to receive a complete copy of the data from the source. One-copy transport systems have at least two significant problems. First, since the data is copied to all of the destinations, the bandwidth of the system is greatly multiplied. Second, since the data is transmitted to all of the destinations, and since not all of the clients may request the data at the same time, the delay between the transmission of the data and the request of the data can be very long. It is possible
