I'm currently reading Open Problems in Computational Geometry, and on page 7 (on page 7, page 6 of the pdf) states "efficient generic algorithms for many shortest path problems have not been found". What are those efficient generic algorithms for the shortest path problem? This question is about the shortest path problem in the weighted directed unweighted graph, but I don't think it makes much of a difference, either way. Anyways, I'm interested in both practical (e.g. PolyLogarithmic) and theoretical (e.g. worst-case) solutions to the shortest path problem. A: There are worst-case efficient algorithms. A short primer is M. L. Fredman, A. Karlin, and E. H. L. A. Lambers, "A 24-point algorithm with worst-case  $(n^{\log(m)})$  time complexity" A summary of their algorithm is: They'll find a direction in which to take a path of at least length  $\frac{3n}{4}$  in  $O(\lg n)$  time. Then, they'll keep removing branches that go from the current point  $x$  to the next point  $y$  that minimizes  $|x-y|+v(y)$ . That is, they'll go from a local minimum to a local minimum in  $O(\lg^2 n)$  time. If they're on the optimal path to  $y$ , they know that
