Enterprise customers have increasingly adopted the Photoshop 3D: Frame technology as a way to integrate a 3D pipeline into their 2D workflow, enabling those businesses to more flexibly and efficiently visualize and edit their content across surfaces. However, with today’s update, Adobe announces the discontinuation of Photoshop’s 3D:Frame technology to evolve the world’s most widely used image editing application. Over the years, PS 3D: Frame has amassed nearly three million downloads across thousands of customers. With the transition to new and emerging native GPU APIs — combining hardware and software rendering to accelerate the delivery of rich media on the Web — several of those customers are exploring these new native APIs to enable their creative applications across their productions. For example, we’re already using the new APIs for Substance™, our family of creative application and asset management tools available on the Adobe Creative Suite. Adobe’s commitment to openness and community has allowed the Photoshop user base to develop powerful extensions for Photoshop that have significantly enhanced the application’s feature set over the decades. Our goal is to ensure that as Photoshop and these native tools evolve, customers continue to have a path to keep up. End-users will have access to open source tools that extend the core of Photoshop. As we shift to the new native GPU-based APIs, this will be the primary path for Adobe to continue to evolve and evolve.
