An analysis of the first half of the data indicated a positive link between air pollution and acute symptoms. But further analysis showed that experiencing acute air pollution when people are exposed to other environmental toxins, such as airborne mold or dust, could actually increase the negative effects of air pollution, because the other toxins could be causing more serious illnesses. The team also analyzed the data to see if air pollution posed a greater risk to those living in poverty, who are more likely to live in places that are not as well-ventilated. But they found that there was no difference in health in people with lower incomes. "The gold standard of outdoor air pollution research is a large, long-term cohort study," said Dr. Tom Burnett, the study's author and director of the Center for Environmental and Climate Change Research at Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health. "That's highly expensive, so most research on air pollution has been small, cross-sectional studies. But there's no one who doesn't try to ask questions about air pollution — it's a ubiquitous exposure that almost everyone will experience. This study helps to clarify the answers we got." There has been little research on air pollution's effects on children. But the researchers said it was possible that children, whose immune systems are developing, are particularly vulnerable. It's also possible that exposures early in life have long-term health effects.
