Adobe has now taken the idea of folders as containers to the next step, letting you group images by type, and as such may be able to organize images to handle the final print sizes. Admittedly, it's a bit of an afterthought, although I'm sure it's actually a big part of the algorithm to determine the "best" way to sort a stack of files. Some of that may no longer be done from the Folder panel, but from the separate Catalog panel. One more thing, you can now create custom size images (from the import screen). A nice feature to have, but it's mainly for web images. The final button when you import an image to resize it is "Resize to my Defined Amount." It makes the image the size you want it (see figure below). You can use this feature to share work that you're working on with other users, co-workers, or companies. Once you sign in with a Share for Review account, you can create a Share or Share for Review item, and start adding your colleagues to the group. Users can add comments that you can then reply to, and you can even choose to use comments to show other users where you're in the project, so you can collaborate without depending on e-mail.
